

Sinclair Broadcasting should not be allowed to air a free political, commercial free ad for the Bush campaign, which is what Stolen Honor is, on public airwaves right before the Presidential election. Not only are they forcing it on their viewers and stations, but this is the second time they have taken a politically motivated stance on broadcasting a program, the first being when they ordered the stations they owned not to show Nightline's reading of the names of soldiers who have died in Iraq. Apparently they don't mind stealing the honor of current Iraqi soldiers.

This seems to be a clear violation of the terms of their use of free public airwaves to me and it would be dispicable for the FCC to make a politically motivated decision to allow this to happen.

I want to live in a democracy, not a corpocracy.
